

Creaks and Groans Explained

For some strange reason people have a fascination with haunted houses. Some people go crazy for them. The question is, would you ever willingly live in one? Would you live in a house if you knew something horrible had happened in it? In fact, many states have laws requiring owners to inform potential buyers if somebody has been murdered in the home or something bad has happened in it. That being said, most "supernatural" events can be explained quite naturally. For instance, it is common that you hear a creak or a groan from the door or attic every now and then. While you might think it is some great, hairy monster coming for you this can very often be explained by something as simple as the weather. During cold months, wood and other materials expand which puts pressure on the supports around them. This expansion causes creaks and groans. During warmer seasons, they shrink back down, making more noise as pressure is released. This is especially common in windows and doorways. In fact, you may notice your doors and windows stick more in the cold months. This is due to said expansion. For a great interest rate come to jumbo loans today. There are things that go bump in the night, but they can easily be explained as well. Tree branches hitting your roof or wind blowing debris around are your usual suspects. Check around the house for low branches or dead branches that need to be removed. Garbage loving raccoons can make a lot of noise breaking into them. For that matter they love your attic or anything else they can get into. Rabbits and possums will make noise in bushes and trees. If you have motion sensor lights they will often activate them as well. For help with your home loan come to FHA mortgage rates for all the information you need. Other things have random explanations to them. Two liter, plastic soda bottles will often pop if there is an air bubble in them and the lid isn't on tight. Refrigerators will make ice and drop it into the ice tray for you to use. If you think something touches your head while you sleep, it is probably the head board of your bed. Unless you don't have a head board, then it is probably a monster about to grab you. Need a home that is not haunted? Check out San Diego new homes for sale for a great home today.
