

What Are The Advantages Of Owning A Smart Phone?

Most people have adopted and adapted to cellular or mobile phones, but the new generation of mobile communication offers so much more. For people on the move, mobile phones do have a significant value but there are people who feel that these devices are all-consuming and intrusive. Taking that value a few steps further are smart phones. Your mobile phone allows you to keep in touch while you are, well, mobile. They allow you to contact others from any location which is why they are particularly handy in an emergency. Unlike before, you no longer have to leave your broken down car at the side of the road while you walk for miles trying to find a pay phone. If you remembered you needed to tell your family something back home and you're already out driving, then you can text message them or call them. For business, mobile phones mean that your colleagues, customers and suppliers can reach you at any time, any where. Smart phones take instant access to a new level, allowing the user to send and receive emails on their phone, access the internet and more. Users will then be allowed to have more freedom and the need to return to the office just to get messages or access information will be minimized. Some would feel that smart phones are leading to a breakdown in face-to-face personal communication and it can also mean that your life is constantly interrupted. If your work requires you to be out of the office for long periods of the day, a smart phone can be a blessing. While on the go, you can respond to requests and answer queries and you will be allowed to keep track of messages. For people who telecommunicate or work offsite, smart phones are as valuable as laptops. For a parent, an important tool for keeping track of children and making all the necessary arrangements when you have a family is a mobile phone. In our world of online interaction, smart phones allow you to stay connected with friends on social networks, book movie tickets, make travel arrangements - all from your phone. There is a disadvantage of having a smart phone and that's becoming almost all-consuming, which means you are practically given no free time. Even when you are having coffee with a friend, it is all too tempting to check your emails or Tweet about a restaurant while you're out for dinner. Teenagers would constantly text and BBM'ing each other and would often ignore the people they are sitting face-to-face with because they seem to find smart phones almost addictive. As a business tool, it is definitely useful to have a smart phone. For personal use, one has to remember the etiquette that we all learnt when cellular phones first hit the market. When there are other people with you, then you should switch it off or at least ignore it. It's still considered important to talk to real people.
